in the blue and gray '70, an effort has been made to present all sides of school life, from the moratorium and assemblies experienced by most students, to the times alone when a person had to get by himself.

a '70 design was used throughout the blue and gray to impress on the reader the beginning of a new era, a time in which students must find a greater role in the type of education which they receive. they must be allowed a greater freedom in living their lives as students.

this also begins an era when the yearbook must cease to be a mere record of the school year. rather, it should be a document showing the feelings and beliefs of the student population. the yearbook should become a vital publication, summing up for the entire student body the course of the year before and the needs of the years ahead.

i hope that the blue and gray '70 has succeeded in presenting these ideas. in addition, i hope the following introduction has shown the need for a greater response to the individual. without a personal response to each student, a school fails in its educational effort.
